Description:

I (Hyunwoo Kim) developed the backend infrastructure for the login and registration pages using Node.js, Express, and MySQL. The system utilizes bcrypt to securely hash and store passwords. Upon successful registration, users are redirected to the login page, where the system verifies credentials against the database. Successful logins prompt a "Successfully signed in" window and redirect users to the home page.

I (William Yu) developed the homepage, FAQ page, and connecting the homepage to product pages. This assignment was to show the final product of our group effort in producing an ecommerce website that uses HTML, CSS, Javascript, Node, Express, and MySQL.

I (Ethan Zhou) developed more on the product page of the website and added additional features into each page to make it more user friendly. The main point of the product page is to let the user view a full size image of the product they are buying and allow them to select the size they prefer for the item. These pages are being produced by using html, css, and more. .

Approach / What I Did:

I (Hyunwoo Kim) created the backend for the login and register pages using Node.js, Express, and MySQL. For the registration page, when you sign up, it checks if the user's input email and password are valid. It also verifies if the same email and password combination exists in our database. When it passes every condition, it stores the user's input in our database. Additionally, I used bcrypt to hash the user's password and store the hashed password securely. Once you sign up, it redirects you to the login page, where it checks if the input email and password match those in the database. If the user's inputs exist in our database, you will receive a "Successfully signed in" window prompt and be redirected to the home page.

I approached this project with mainly updating the pages to the final form. Ideally, it would use a backend that holds all the products which the front end would grab according to a description, such as the type of product it was (shoes, jerseys, cap) or by teams of affiliated athletes. Instead, the approach I took was manually updating the front page with the appropriate prices and names to the product which I linked to the actual product page. I also sped up the banner which felt slow prior to this update.

I (Ethan Zhou) created the product page for the user by thinking from the user's perspective on how a product page should be looking from their point of view. First, I make sure to include an image that is big enough where users can have a very clear view on how the product should look like. Therefore, I make sure to use css to increase the size of the image to an acceptable size. I also include a description of the product along with the price.

Issues and Resolutions:

I (Hyunwoo Kim) was confused when creating the database and table. After reviewing the MySQL slides on the Canvas modules, I figured out how to create both the database and table. I was also confused about connecting MySQL with Node.js, but once again, after reviewing the MySQL slides, I resolved the issue.

An obvious issue was running into a miscommunication on which product to produce. So instead of having an unused product page, I changed one of the product pages to match the product displayed on the banner. A more robust approach would be to have a section that shows all the products which would also include products not displayed in the homepage. As previously mentioned, having a database holding all the products would support this approach and make it more robust. Unfortunately, I ran into a few personal issues that made it difficult to take this approach.

I (Ethan Zhou) ran into the issue where the image is not showing up on the website when we run it. After looking through the code and everything, I finally noticed where the error is coming from. To fix that error, I just need to use the "/" symbol to link everything together without running into errors. After applying the correct symbol into the code, I was able to get the image running on our website.

Next issue...

Analysis: (Reflect on what you have learned and how decisions made could impact users.)
I (Hyunwoo Kim) have learned a lot about the back end, MySQL, Node.js, and Express. I now know how to create databases and tables, connect Node.js with MySQL, and the 'npm install' before diving in. The most interesting part was the importance of hashing user passwords before storing their data. This step can be risky, opening up the possibility of someone hacking into our website and accessing every user's data, especially their passwords

I had a look at the modules for the back end and I feel like I have a decent understanding on how to use it in future approaches. The database can make it so that the front end is not as static. It also allows the products on the pages to be easily changed and filtered. For example, we could have a page for products that are filtered by teams, which are identified by a description in the database. This would likely also make it easier to add a product into the cart as each product is already created in the database.

I (Ethan Zhou) learned that having a clear and easy to understand product is really important for the users that are using our website to purchase products. From doing this assignment, I now know how to link images together into a single html page with the right size fitting. The decision I make really does have a huge impact on the users. Adding a more detailed description of the product can help the users understand what kind of product they are buying.

Jordan 4 Retro

Jordan 4 Retro Off-White Sail

Description: Jordan Brand and Virgil Abloh teamed up once again to release the third silhouette in their collaborative history with the women's Jordan 4 Retro Off-White Sail (W), now available on StockX. After teasing the release of the Off-White 4 with samples in his MCA exhibit and presenting them in his Off-White FW2020 Women's Show, Virgil Abloh finally delivered what might be the most anticipated release of 2020. The Air Jordan 4 Sail features full-grain leather uppers with hits of mesh and translucent materials on the toebox and heel of the shoe. From there, hits of light blue on the tongue's Jumpman and the outsole's Nike Swoosh provide contrast to the sail colored sneaker. These women's sneakers released in July of 2020 and retailed for $200 USD.
